The world's most extensive dictionary and translator. Babylon NG is a desktop tool that provides you with a rich dictionary for 77 languages as well as a translator for text, entire documents, and even websites. It gets integrated with Internet Explorer, Firefox, Chrome, Adobe Reader and Microsoft Office (Word, Excel, PowerPoint) to help translate text on the spot. Following a speedy setup operation that shouldn't give you any trouble, you're welcomed by a user-friendly interface with a tutorial. The main app window is split in four distinct tabs for looking up words in the dictionary, translating text and documents, and performing currency conversions. Look up dictionary words in 77 languages. The dictionary tab is accompanied by a simple function that swiftly locates a word. It records searches to history and shows partial matches in real time (while typing). Before running a search, however, you might be interested in choosing the dictionary language. Furthermore, you can right-click any selected word to look up its meaning. Translate text, documents and websites. The text translation tab features two areas for typing or pasting the source text as well as for viewing the translated counterpart. You can choose the source and output language from two menus and easily swap them. A text-to-speech tool can be activated to hear how words are correctly pronounced in foreign languages. The document translation tab has similar options. Besides picking the "from" and "to" language, you can upload text documents up to 5MB, as long as they have the PDF (Adobe), DOC (MS Word), PPT (MS PowerPoint) or XLS format (MS Excel). Once the translation is over, you can inspect results in an automatically opened plain text document (TXT). Another aspect worth noting over here is that the document translator works even if you don't have Adobe Acrobat or Microsoft Office installed (not even the runtime files). It's not possible to translate multiple docs at once. To use KEYMACRO, first create a new word list. (You need to restart the computer to initialize the word list.) After creating the word list, press the Export button to create a CSV-format file that can be imported in Excel. If you don't have a CSV-file, you can also export the data directly from the database. You can then use the word list in your language of choice. On your computer, add a reference to the word list as a comma-separated list of words. For example, the word list in German is given as . In any application, the word list can be used in combination with a text-to-speech engine to render the words into your language. This way, the keys you pressed on your keyboard can be saved and logged in a database. You can see all the keyboard keys pressed during a specific time interval in the timeline. You can also search for individual words using the search feature. This is very useful when you have a specific word you are searching for in a book or document. If you want to see exactly how you typed a certain word, you can search backwards. This way, you can also save all words typed to a text file so you can use it later. You can also import keyboard keys from a previous recording into a new word list. After importing a word list, you can see the word list in alphabetical order and delete items. Additionally, you can restrict the time interval during which you want to log all keyboard keys. The default time interval is 24 hours. You can also change this setting. You can also set passwords for each word list to restrict access to the word list and the database to individual people. Autostart and Password protection KeyMACRO runs in the background without interfering with your computer. You can start it manually or set it to automatically start at Windows logon. There is no user interface, so you can install it without any
