Effects of carnosine, L-carnosine, and homocarnosine on the activity of mitochondrial glycerophosphate dehydrogenase from skeletal muscle of different species. The effects of carnosine and its racemates, L-carnosine and homocarnosine on the activity of mitochondrial glycerophosphate dehydrogenase (GPDH) from rabbit skeletal muscle were studied in comparison with the effects of its constituent amino acids. The effects of carnosine, L-carnosine, and homocarnosine were compared with those of glycine and L-alanine on the activity of GPDH. When the rate of production of reduced pyridine nucleotides was measured in the presence of carnosine or its analogue at concentrations ranging from 5 to 100 microM, carnosine displayed the greatest suppressive effect on the activity of mitochondrial GPDH at 10 microM. L-Carnosine was much less active, with an IC50 at 10 microM of 20 mM, compared with that of carnosine, which was 1 mM. Homocarnosine was weakly inhibitory. Above 10 microM concentrations, carnosine and its analogue did not inhibit mitochondrial GPDH. At 4 microM concentrations, glycine and alanine had relatively the same inhibitory activities on the activity of mitochondrial GPDH as carnosine and L-carnosine, respectively. Above 10 microM concentrations, glycine and L-alanine exhibited a suppressive effect on the activity of the enzyme similar to that of carnosine and L-carnosine, respectively. These results suggest that carnosine and its analogue have a greater affinity for the active site of mitochondrial GPDH than glycine and L-alanine. The results also indicate that carnosine and its analogue exert an inhibitory effect on the catalytic activity of the enzyme in a non-competitive manner. If you need a new motherboard, your options are limited. With AMD no longer making any chipsets for the socket FM1, motherboard manufacturers have had to step up their game. Anandtech writer Mike Adams has a review of a new board from ASRock today, the ASRock A88X Extreme4. The real meat of the board comes from its VRM and PWM sections which are twice as strong as what you get on a Z87 chipset board. The higher VRM is the Foreign policy is also a subject of skepticism and indifference. 'Abduction' is brutal and understated—not a one-hour fun fest."
